
Pupils get taste of the future

THE start of the summer term means the culmination of a year of hard work and study, as the exams season kicks into gear.

But for hundreds of young people in Leicester, it also means a new school, thanks to the national Building Schools for the Future programme.

As chief executive officer of the agency responsible for this programme to transform education – and the life chances of millions of young people across England – I am delighted that Beaumont Leys has opened its doors to students, teachers and members of the local community ahead of schedule this month.

All those involved in this project, especially the head teacher and her team, Leicester City Council and Leicester Miller Education Company, should be congratulated for their hard work and dedication.

Tim Byles, Partnerships for Schools, London.
